

Unit 8: Mobile Version Wireframes

In this project I was working on creating wireframes for a mobile version of my website. I'm not yet sure how to build it specifically this way, but this is an example of how I would like it to be.

Dimensions I used are 640px by 1136px which is an iPhone 5 version, and I decided to use these dimensions because this is what I use myself.

This is mobile version, not a responsive one for browsers.

I would like it to be a scroll-down option, where you can navigate yourself up and down by sliding up and down, and also you can navigate yourself to the part of website you need by tapping on a navigation link. There are four of them: about, objects, visions and contact. If you want to go up to top where navigation is, you should tap a green title/link which will lead you to the very top.

I still have to see what I can do to make this idea work, but that will be the next step.

HOME PAGE

This is what appears in front of your eyes when you load the mobile version of the website.

Home page with the header showing the title, navigation and two logo images that you could see in the desktop version of the website.

Color scheme is also matching with the original.

Tap on the navigation element and it will locate you where you chose to go, or simply slide down to see more content.

Logos are not clickable.

ABOUT+OBJECTS

This is about+objects location.
All I want is a short description of my persona and my work.

This image you can see stands for an image gallery that I would like to create, mobile scale friendly images that can show you interesting sides of my work, and hopefully, lead you to the full version of my website. I will create slide-show marks to indicate that you can slide images to see more.

My aim is to provoke curiosity and interest, so I would like to keep things easy for the moment. Also, people interested in visual side of things like to view galleries where they can see attractive pictures.
